

UK Import Trends Monitor

An assessment of HMRC data for UK imports up to 30 June 2026

Published: 27 August 2026

Purpose

This analysis seeks to identify anomalous increases in import volume and anomalous decreases in import unit prices for goods imported into the UK. The approach is designed to highlight patterns in trade that may warrant further investigation, particularly where there is a risk of negative impacts on UK producers. The findings are intended to serve as an initial indication of commodities that may require further investigation. It does not provide a definitive assessment or conclusive evidence of grounds for a trade remedy investigation. New cases must meet legislative requirements. Further engagement with industry stakeholders and complementary qualitative evidence will help to validate and contextualise these findings.

Methodology

The analysis utilises data published by HMRC, covering UK imports of individual CN8 commodities up to the end of June 2026. For each CN8 commodity, imports during the most recent 12 months for which data are available are compared with imports during the same period in previous years. A series of quantitative criteria are evaluated to determine whether a particular CN8 commodity has exhibited an anomalous increase in import volume, or decrease in import unit price. Note that the identification of a commodity through this analysis does not necessarily confirm the existence of an unfair trading practice. It is also likely that the analysis will not identify all commodities that may require further investigation.

Criteria for detecting anomalous increases in import volume

1. Percentage Increase in Import Volume - Checks whether the import volume in the latest 12 months has increased by at least 20%, compared to the same 12 month period in the previous year.
2. Statistically Unusual Percentage Change - Evaluates whether the annual percentage change in import volume is unexpectedly large compared to typical fluctuations. This is measured using a Z-score, which describes how far a value is from the average in terms of standard deviations. In this case, the Z-score reflects deviation from the historical average percentage change in 12-month volumes, calculated using historical data since 2016. A z-score of at least 2 indicates that the latest annual percentage change is a statistically rare increase, and this criterion is met.
3. Statistically Unusual Absolute Change - Evaluates whether the absolute change in import volume between the latest 12 months and the previous 12 months is unexpectedly large compared to typical fluctuations. In this case, the Z-score reflects deviation from the historical average absolute change in 12-month volumes. A Z-score of at least 2 indicates that the latest annual absolute change is a statistically rare increase, and this criterion is met.

If all three criteria are met for a given CN8 commodity, that commodity is flagged as exhibiting an anomalous increase in import volume.

Criteria for detecting anomalous decreases in import unit price

1. Percentage Decrease in Import Unit Value - Checks whether the import unit value in the latest 12 months has increased by at least 20%, compared to the same 12-month period in the previous year.
2. Statistically Unusual Percentage Change - Evaluates whether the annual percentage change in import unit price is unexpectedly large compared to typical fluctuations. This is measured using a Z-score, which describes how far a value is from the average in terms of standard deviations. In this case, the Z-score reflects deviation from the historical average percentage change in 12-month unit prices, calculated using historical data since 2016. A z-score of at least 2 indicates that the latest annual percentage change is a statistically rare increase, and this criterion is met.
3. Statistically Unusual Absolute Change - Evaluates whether the absolute change in import unit price between the latest 12 months and the previous 12 months is unexpectedly large compared to typical fluctuations. In this case, the Z-score reflects deviation from the historical average absolute change in 12-month unit prices. A Z-score of 2 or higher indicates that the latest annual absolute change is a statistically rare increase, and this criterion is met.

If all three criteria are met for a given CN8 commodity, that commodity is flagged as exhibiting an anomalous increase in import unit price

Notes

- The methodology is subject to continuous review and enhancement, and may be adjusted in future releases.
- Due to a lack of sufficiently granular production data, it is not possible to determine whether there is UK production across all CN8 commodity codes.
- Value is in current prices and has not been adjusted for inflation.
- Some commodity codes will have been changed, merged or dropped over time in line with concordance changes. These changes have not been captured.
- HMRC data is considered provisional for 18 months, whilst checks are undertaken.
- Country of origin data may be incorporated in future iterations as more data are collected. Results relating to global imports are unaffected by which country attribution is used. Active investigations assess both country of origin and country of dispatch data.
- Several factors may influence the results, including:
 - Statistical artefacts: Some commodities may be flagged as a result of baseline effects, where low import volumes or unit prices in previous years exaggerate percentage changes. These baseline effects are more likely when assessing imports dispatched from specific partner countries or regions.
 - Product heterogeneity: Variations in product quality, branding, or specification within the same commodity code can distort price comparisons. This analysis does not account for any such differences.
 - Temporary fluctuations: Short-term spikes in trade may not indicate a structural shift or diversion of trade flows.
 - Data limitations: The analysis is based on available customs data and may not capture all relevant market dynamics or supply chain changes.
 - Country attribution: Country of dispatch is used rather than country of origin, as origin data hasn't been collected on a consistent basis far enough back to support this methodology. The country of dispatch is not necessarily the same as the country of origin for a given import.

Results

Import volume

The following heatmap shows the total number of CN8 commodities, grouped by HS section, that displayed an anomalous increase in import volume during the 12 months to June 2026. Results are also provided for a selection of trading partners or trading blocs covered by existing UK trade remedy measures or live investigations. The analysis is based on a methodology (detailed in the Methodology section) applied separately at both the global level, represented in shades of red, and for a selection of individual countries and regions, represented in shades of blue. Because the methodology is applied independently for each geographical group, a commodity may be flagged as displaying an anomalous increase in import volume from a specific country or region, even if it is not flagged at the global level, or vice versa.

Note, the following heatmaps reflect the number of CN8 codes flagged under the applied criteria, and do not account for the total value or volume of imports. HS sections with a greater number of constituent CN8 codes may naturally exhibit a higher count of flagged goods. Partner countries/regions accounting for a greater overall number of imported CN8 codes may naturally exhibit a higher count of flagged goods.

Import unit price

The following heatmap shows the total number of CN8 commodities, grouped by HS section, that displayed an anomalous decrease in import unit price during the 12 months to June 2026. Results are also provided for a selection of trading partners or trading blocs covered by existing UK trade remedy measures or live investigations. The analysis is based on a methodology (detailed in the Methodology section) applied separately at both the aggregate level, represented in shades of purple, and for a selection of individual countries and regions, represented in shades of teal. Because the methodology is applied independently for each geographical group, a commodity may be flagged as displaying an anomalous decrease in import unit price from from a specific country or region, even if it is not flagged at the global level, or vice versa.

Note, the heatmap only reflects the number of CN8 codes flagged under the applied criteria. It does not account for the total value or volume of imports. HS sections with a greater number of constituent CN8 codes may naturally exhibit a higher count of flagged goods. Partner countries/regions accounting for a greater overall number of imported CN8 codes may naturally exhibit a higher count of flagged goods.

Goods flagged based on trends in import volumes and per unit price

The following table reports additional information on the specific commodities that were flagged based on global imports, including the volume and average unit price for imports during the latest 12 months, and percentage changes in those metrics since the previous 12-month period. It also shows whether a commodity was flagged on the basis of an anomalous increase in import volume, an anomalous decrease in import unit price, or both.
